

Shouldn't hospitals be designed with the whole family in mind?

We think so.

What if we could improve the experience of going to the hospital – not just for the patient, but for the entire family?

The people of Aurora Health Care search every day for ways to make health care more friendly, personalized and human by including family members and friends as part of the healing process. This often includes simple things, like making sure your family can visit whenever they wish. It also includes attention to the hospital environment itself. Studies show improved patient outcomes and satisfaction when hospitals are designed to be home-like, to support patient dignity and to encourage family participation in care.

That's why we provide hospital rooms that are warm and comfortable, with medical equipment tucked out of sight to reduce anxiety. And it's why we use plants, soft lighting and even music to create non-institutional environments. These amenities are contributing to positive results for our patients and greater job satisfaction for our employees, too.
